Nt-Great

Integration of foreign students into the society of the city of Nürtingen

What is Nt-Great?

Nt-Great is a project for integrating foreign students into the society of Nürtingen, coordinated by Nürtingen Geislingen University (NGU) and the University of Art Therapy. The framework of the project is provided by the nationwide programme "PROFIN" (Programme to promote integration of international students) run by the DAAD (German Academic Exchange Service). As a part of this programme, the international office of NGU is realising a number of individual projects helping international students to integrate successfully into their new environment in Nürtingen, encompassing the university, society and the working world. The various projects enable the students to meet local people outside of the classroom and to build up many contacts with German families, schools, social institutions, companies and interested citizens in general.

This brochure is aimed at giving you an overview of the NT-Great project and at presenting the individual project parts. Should you have any questions or suggestions or be interested in cooperating, please get in touch with us.

About the Project Name “Nt-Great”

In May 2011, the International Office was searching for an innovative name for its new PROFIN integration project. In a competition launched by the international office, students, teachers and staff members of NGU were asked to bring forward their ideas for a new project name. “Nt-Great” was the suggestion of a student and won the first prize in the competition because of its creativity and complexity. Pronounced almost the same way as the English word “in-te-grate”, the title represents first and foremost the common goal of all the diverse project activities: the integration of foreign students. Due to the extra-particular spelling, the title even incorporates two further aspects: on the one hand, it stands for the two locations of the university: Nürtingen (Nt) and Geislingen (G), which stresses the importance of integrating and cooperating with the inhabitants of these two towns in our integration project. On the other hand, the spelling includes the English word “great”, which may stand both for the project itself, and even more for all participating people in it: Nt-Great – Great projects for great people.

1. Study Programme: Cross-Cultural Experience

(1) Project idea: Voluntary work as a way of integration

Many foreign students who are new to Nürtingen have no trouble to find international friends at the university or the students' dormitory. However, getting in touch with local people and truly immersing in the German culture can turn out to be challenging. That is why Nürtingen Geislingen University (NGU) wants to promote integration by having international students engage in voluntary work. Volunteering offers many opportunities to young people from abroad: they are able to get in touch with society and meet local people, they can make experiences which go far beyond their normal studies and they can contribute something positive to the society they are momentarily living in.

Social commitment has a big tradition in Nürtingen. The town labelled as the "Capital of Civil Social Commitment" has already been awarded several prizes for the outstanding social engagement of its citizens, such as the "Bertelsmann Preis" in 1999 (a prize awarded for innovative concepts and creative solutions to social problem areas) and the "Deutscher Engagement Preis" (German Volunteering Prize) in 2009.

Inclusion into town events

Social community work therefore has a high significance in Nürtingen – and the town also provides an excellent infrastructure for a voluntary work project. Since 1991, the Bürgertreff (City Volunteer Centre) has been coordinating voluntary work in town and has become a central contact point for local initiatives, clubs, or special interest groups. Its goals are to be intercultural, integrative and open to people of all ages and backgrounds. These are the resources Nürtingen Geislingen

University wants to make available to foreign students, too.

(2) Combining voluntary work and university education

Students who are studying at NGU can combine their participation in the voluntary work programme with a lecture at the university, thereby obtaining academic credit points for their work. In the frame of the project, a new module in English language was launched in 2023. Within this module, students can visit a lecture in Social Sciences for 2 contact hours per week and have to do 2 additional contact hours of voluntary work per week in the community (in total: 40 hours in the course of one semester). For the combination of the lecture and the voluntary work, the students receive 6 ECTS points as well as a certificate for their social work.

(3) About the voluntary work

Students are free to choose any activity which matches their skills and interests. For instance, they can get involved in charities or social institutions, such as old-age homes, kindergartens, youth clubs, workshops for disabled people, the food bank in Nürtingen, a fair trade shop, and many more. Other possibilities for them to get engaged are at big town events or intercultural activities coordinated by the intercultural forum of the Bürgertreff (City Volunteer Centre). Here, the students' activities may range from organising sports competitions ("Mission Olympics"), animating and supervising children during town events ("Family Day"), planning activities for an Intercultural Week or working as mentors in the "FIT project", where they can coordinate activities with high-school students who have an immigration background.

Through their voluntary work the students can acquire key competences for the future, gain an intense insight into their host country, and have the possibility to become an active and integrated part of the community they are living in.

(4) The Social Sciences Lecture

The "Social Sciences lecture" shall give a first look into the topics, methods and theories of social sciences. The students will look into topics like social change, modern family development, social action, social stratification and inequality with a sociologist's perspective. In order to pass the lecture, the students have to do a presentation in class and to write a paper on a theoretical subject. The grade will be based on both presentation and paper. Attendance and active participation in class is required and will also have an impact on the grade. The voluntary work is counted as additional workload which is necessary to obtain the credits for this class. In addition to this, the students have to participate in a compulsory Intercultural Competence seminar in the beginning and an introduction seminar for the voluntary work. For the entire module, the students receive 6 ECTS credit points. This module is open to all students.

2. School Programme: Ask a Foreign Student (AFoS)

The idea of the school programme is to bring teachers, school children and international students of NGU together and initiate an interesting intercultural exchange. The way is simple: teachers invite an international student to one of their classes and prepare a lesson together. That way, the teachers can use the high international potential Nürtingen has to offer through its students from all over the world for the intercultural education of their pupils. The student can support German teachers when they are covering international topics in class, such as specific countries (geography), religions and moral concepts (ethics / philosophy) or, of course, go to a foreign languages class. That way, German teenagers can practise their language skills with a native speaker and get new motivation for their studies.

For the international students, this is an ideal opportunity to represent their country and answer questions about their culture. They get in touch with a target group that is completely independent of their university environment and gain a vivid impression of the German school system.

At the same time, teachers have the chance to offer an exciting lesson to their students and to profit from the expert knowledge an international student can provide about his or her home country.

Authentic communication

All school types addressed

The school programme is open for any type of school and any age-group of students. While senior high schools may seek more sophisticated discussions about politics, history or economy as well as opportunities for their students to practise their foreign language skills, primary schools will have different needs and goals. Here, the students might prepare songs or games and provide a playful and interactive approach towards their culture for the school children.

What the teacher and the international student decide to prepare for their class is completely up to them and discussed individually for each lesson. Project work, interviews, presentations or games are only a few possibilities, and both teachers and students are welcome to bring in their own interests and ideas.

3. Host Family Programme: Join a Family (JaFa)

In the Host Family Programme, foreign students have the chance to meet German families that are interested in spending some free time with an international student. This does not mean that the internationals are staying with the families but they join them from time to time for particular activities, such as visiting cultural events, going on day trips at the weekends or simply having a cup of tea together. For the families, this is a good way to build up contacts with young people from far-away countries and to make their every day lives more colourful and international. The students can benefit from getting to know people outside of the university campus and from gaining a personal insight into the German way of life.

Free-time activities with German families

Typical activities include short trips to the Swabian Alps, going to festivals or town events within the region, visiting museums, inviting the students to dinner or spending public holidays together.

The Host Family Programme welcomes all types of families, old and young, with children or without. The goal of the programme is to foster intercultural understanding and friendship between people from different countries.

4. Tandem Programme: Partner with a Foreign Student (PaFoS)

A “tandem” is a language exchange between Germans who want to study a particular foreign language and international students who would like to improve their German. By talking to each other in both languages, the two tandem partners support each other in learning their respective native languages while gaining an intensive insight into their partner’s cultural background.

International Friendship

Since a lot of international students often spend time with other foreigners and are lacking opportunities to practise their German, the tandem programme is an ideal way to meet locals and improve their language skills. At the same time, Germans can interact with a native speaker and refresh or learn a foreign language without having to travel to the country where it is spoken.

However, language does not have to remain the only focus of a tandem partnership. Even if foreign students do not speak German yet and just want to meet locals – or if citizens from Nürtingen are simply keen to meet people from other countries without having a specific interest in their language – a tandem can be very enriching. You can exchange sightseeing tips, get to know more about foreign traditions, or simply spend some free time with each other.

Any citizen from Nürtingen who is interested in the programme is invited to join. The tandem programme is open to everyone - not only students.

5. Theme Night Programme: Present a Foreign Country (PaFoC)

Theme nights at which international students present their home countries have already been organised for a long time by the ecumenical community of NGU. In a new cooperation with the International Office, this interesting programme is going to be further enhanced.

International students usually look for creative ways to present their country to other people at the theme nights. Apart from doing a presentation with the most important information about the history, geography, and culture of their country, they offer typical local food for everybody to taste. Very often, folk music, costumes, dances, quizzes, games or personal anecdotes turn the theme nights into a vivid and colourful introduction to a foreign country. The authentic and personal view of a native and the relaxed atmosphere create the special charm of the university theme nights.

In addition to that, the International Office and the ecumenical community offer a Christmas gathering where the international students can experience classical Swabian Christmas food and traditions and learn more about the meaning of Christmas. At the same time, the foreigners are invited to share their own national Christmas traditions or other similarly important holidays with the group, too, thus actively contributing to the event.

6. Internship Programme: Employ a Foreign Student (EFoS)

In order to gain first-hand experience on the German job market, international students are offered special internships at various local companies to gain practical experience in a German working environment. Students can apply for these internships on a voluntary basis – the internship programme does not replace the official internships required by individual study courses of NGU. The International Office provides support for the international interns and evaluates the internships together with them and with the involved companies at the end.

This programme enables companies to benefit from the expert knowledge of their international interns with regards to a particular country, culture, and language. A company can delegate particular tasks to their international interns which cannot be accomplished on the same quality level by a German intern. On the other hand, international students benefit from their internship by learning more about the German working culture.

New interested companies within the Stuttgart region are always invited to participate in the programme.

Long Term Effects

NGU has a strong interest in promoting these projects on a long-term basis, both as an indication of the university's international orientation and as a way of advertising its vision for the future. The study courses of Nürtingen Geislingen university have been standing for economy and environment for generations. Therefore, the university administration aims at aligning itself along the principles of the "triple P" – people, planet, profit – in order to contribute to a new balancing of social, ecological and economic challenges. As an institution of higher education, the university considers itself significantly responsible towards social developments and matters of education policy.
